

Museum of Art

Two kids, Ayaan and Meera, ducked into an old gallery to escape the rain.

Only one corner was lit, where a painting of a tall yellow clock tower watched over a tiny town, beside another painting of a hill church and wild blue sea.

"The tower looks lonely," Ayaan murmured.

"Maybe it's not lonely," Meera said. "Maybe it remembers too much."

An old curator stepped closer.

"The artist grew up under that tower," he told them. "He left the town, but he painted it so it could never leave him." The children stared

They could almost hear footsteps on the wet streets, smell the sea, and feel the wind in the trees on the hill.

The clock in the painting had no hands, only soft circles of light.

"Why no time?" Ayaan asked.

"So his memories never grow old," the curator replied. "This isn't just a place. It's the part of him that words couldn't hold."

When the rain stopped, Ayaan and Meera stepped back outside.

They didn't know the artist's name, but the town in the painting felt strangely familiar, like a dream they might have had together.

-----X THE END X-----